1. Introduction

The practical realism of Elizabeth I's decision to allow the use of Irish as a means of promoting the Reformation in Ireland probably evoked a rather cool response in some quarters. Certainly the long delay in publishing the New Testament in Irish, a project initiated in the 1560s and not realised until 1602–3, shows no great evidence of enthusiasm. Nevertheless as steps were taken to implement this policy, for example by appointing ministers and bishops competent in Irish, it must have appeared to many that it was no longer impolitic to be known to support or encourage proselytising through Irish, and so we find Sir William Herbert 'patting himself on the back' for his efforts in this regard as he writes from Castleisland, Co. Kerry, to the Lord High Treasurer of England, Lord Burghley, on 30 April 1587:

Touching the estate of religion in these parts, here is neither public prayers in any church nor private prayers that any of them doth understand, whereby it seemeth God is altogether unserved. I have taken order that public prayers shall be said in their own tongue, and that they shall assemble themselves at their churches on the Sundays. I have caused the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, and the Articles of the Belief, to be translated into Irish, and this day the ministers of these parts repair unto me to have it in writing. They have undertaken to instruct their parishioners in it. I find them very tractable and willing to learn the truth. I hope to do some good therein with them.

And again in the first of three tracts which he sent to Burghley in 1588 he says:

...I have been careful in those parts wherein I am, to have them taught the truth in their natural tongue, to have the Lord's Prayer, the Articles of the Creed, the Ten Commandments, translated into the Irish tongue; [and have instituted] public prayers in that language, with the administration of the sacraments and other ecclesiastical rites, which in a strange tongue could be to them but altogether unprofitable.

1 For the pre-Reformation period see Celtica 21 (1990) 470–88.
3 The phrase is Brian Ó Cuív's: Irish dialects and Irish-speaking districts (Dublin 1981) 14.
4 Calendar of the state papers relating to Ireland of the reign of Elizabeth, 1586–8, 331. See Williams, I l brianta i leabhar, 28.
5 Calendar of state papers, Ireland, Elizabeth, 1586–8, 533. On the authorship of this tract see ibid., 538–9.
Herbert's translation of the Pater, the Ten Commandments and the Articles of Belief (i.e. the Apostles' Creed) has not survived, to my knowledge, and it was in any case otiose, for Irish versions of the Pater were already in existence and all these items which he had translated had appeared in print in Irish in two Reformation texts published over the preceding twenty years, Seán Carsuel's Foirm na n-Urrmuidheadh (Edinburgh 1567) and Seán Ó Cearnaigh's Aibidil Gaoidheilge agus cal-úcisma (Dublin 1571). It is, however, possible that Herbert may have been unaware of the existence of these two books and that copies of them were not available in Kerry in 1587. Carsuel had certainly intended his book to be read and used, not only in Scotland, but also in Ireland, and it is clear that it was known here. It is, however, unlikely, however, that a large edition was printed, and there is no evidence that any further editions appeared, so that it is improbable that many copies made their way to any part of Ireland, even to places much less remote than Castlesisland. Ó Cearnaigh's book also can have had only a very limited circulation, since it was published in an edition of only two hundred copies and does not appear to have been reprinted.

This implies that neither Carsuel's nor Ó Cearnaigh's version of the Pater had any great impact on popular practice in Ireland, particularly when it is remembered that they would have been used only by the Protestant minority of the Irish-speaking population, while the Catholic majority continued to recite the prayer in Latin. These versions are nevertheless important as being the third and fourth oldest surviving Irish versions, and the only published Irish versions of the sixteenth century. There are aspects of them, too, which are of intrinsic interest in that, on the one hand, they seem to provide evidence for the continued survival of the older versions and for the existence of still other versions, and, on the other hand, suggest that they themselves, or versions like them, formed the basis for the two early seventeenth-century Reformation versions, namely, that of the Gospel of St Luke in the 1602–3 New Testament, and that of the Gospel of St Matthew, which in turn is repeated with some variations in Uilliam Ó Domhnaill's Leabhar na nUrrnaightheadh gComhchoidchiond (Dublin 1608), in William Bedell's Aibhthir i le agasg cheudlosughadh an Chriostaidhe (Dublin 1631) and in Gofraidh Mac Domhnaill's An leagasy Criostuidhe (Dublin 1652).

---

8 N. Williams, Li brionta i leabhar, 20, suggests that it is unlikely that more than five hundred copies were printed.
9 Ibid., 22.
2. CARSEUER'S FOIRM NA n-URRNUIDHEADH

Seán Carsuel's Foirm na n-Urrnuidheadh (FU)\textsuperscript{10} is a translation of the Book of Common Order (BCO) of the Church of Scotland. The prose text of the Pater occurs twice,\textsuperscript{11} the version being the same in both cases, apart from two misprints in the first and the absence of the opening address in the second.\textsuperscript{12} I give the text here as edited by R. L. Thomson at lines 1132–9, having, however, corrected the two misprints and having broken the text into petitions for ease of reference:

\begin{enumerate}
\item Ar n-Áthair-ne átá ar neamh, go ma beandaighthe th'ainm;
\item go dú do righe;
\item go ma dèanta do thoil a dtalmhuin mar átá ar neamh;
\item tabhair dhùinn aniu ar n-arain laithreachail;
\item agas maith dhùinn ar bfiacha, amhail mхаithmacid-ne dår bfiicheamhnuith;
\item agas ná léig a mbuidhreadh sind,
\item acht saor síd ó olc;
\item d'fhor is leat-sa an righe, an neart, agas an gáloir, tré bhioth síor.
\end{enumerate}

Fhíodh amhluidh.

The most significant innovation in this version is the use of the optative subjunctive in place of the imperative of the earlier versions in the first three petitions. I am unable to establish whether this innovation is Carsuel's own, or whether in this regard he made use of an existing translation: at all events it subsequently became the norm, though not precisely in the same form in the first and third petitions, where the periphrastic copula with verbal adjective was replaced by the autonomous verb. I would suggest that Carsuel's construction was an attempt to provide a close rendering of a Scottish English version of the Pater, the implication being that he himself may have been responsible, if not for the introduction of the optative, then at least for the form it takes in the first and third petitions of his version.

Carsuel claimed to have translated BCO from Latin and English.\textsuperscript{13} However, since no Latin version existed of that work in the form translated by him, either his claim was based on a misunderstanding which could have led him to believe that, in translating the English, he was translating a Latin original at one remove, or his reference to Latin was \textsuperscript{10}The first modern edition was that of Thomas McLauchlan (Edinburgh 1873); references here, however, are to Thomson's edition: see above.

\textsuperscript{11}Lines 1132–9 and 1574–80. A verse rendering, 'An Pàidear a mac dearacht dhàmna', occurs at lines 3903–3933.
\textsuperscript{12}The misprints are go mo for go ma (line 1132) in the first petition, and doí for do (line 1133) in the second. The lack of the opening address, Ar n-Áthair-ne átá ar neamh, in the second occurrence of the prayer (line 1574) is due to the fact that here the Pater forms part of a very long prayer which opens with the address A Dhè uile-chumhachtaigh agas a Áthair neamhda (line 1428) followed by the address a Thighsearna at several points subsequently.
\textsuperscript{13}Thomson, Foirm na n-Urrnuidheadh, 1.
intended to dispose his Highland readers to a more sympathetic attitude towards the book and its contents than if its origin were entirely Lowland and English.\textsuperscript{14} R. L. Thomson considers it 'likely . . . that his translation was . . . entirely or predominantly based on the English of BCO'.\textsuperscript{15} It would appear that the English text of the \textit{Pater} was not given in BCO at the point corresponding to FU lines 1132–9\textsuperscript{16} but it was given at the point corresponding to FU lines 1574–80 as follows:

1 . . . So that thy Name may be sanctified:
2 Thy Kingdom come:
3 Thy Will be done in earth as it is in heaven:
4 Give us this day our daily bread:
5 And forgive us our dets even as we forgive our detters:
6 And lead us not into tentation,
7 but deliver us from evil:

for thine is the Kingdome, and the power, and the glorie for ever and ever. Amen.\textsuperscript{17}

It is likely that the normal form of the first petition, freed from the context in which it occurs here, was 'Our Father which art in heaven, sanctified be thy Name'.\textsuperscript{18} Carsuel's version provides a perfectly good translation of the first three petitions of this rather standard English \textit{Pater} and indeed of the complete text. Nevertheless, since other aspects of his version would seem to suggest that he knew of Irish versions similar to those of LB–EG and \textit{Liber Flavus}, one might ask why he abandoned their imperatives in favour of the optative subjunctive forms of his first three petitions.

\textsuperscript{14}ibid., lvi.
\textsuperscript{15}ibid.
\textsuperscript{16}I have not seen a copy of the original BCO (Edinburgh 1664). G. W. Sprott, \textit{The Book of Common Order of the Church of Scotland} (Edinburgh and London 1901), which reproduces Andrew Hart's large edition of 1611, and Thomas McLauchlan, (note 10 above), which gives the English text from David Laing's edition of the \textit{Works of John Knox} (1846–64), both lack the \textit{Pater} at this point apart from the opening address, \textit{Our Father which art in heaven}.
\textsuperscript{17}The text is that given in McLauchlan, 97. Apart from orthography and punctuation, that given in Sprott, 102, is identical with it, with the single exception that it has \textit{on earth} in the third petition.
\textsuperscript{18}The complete text would then be the same in all important respects as that in \textit{The myrrhour of the Chyrche} printed in London in 1521 by Wynkyn de Worde: 'Our Fader that art in Heven, sanctifie be thi Name; thy Kyngdome come to us, thy wyl be done in erth as in Heven, our dayly brede gyue us to day and forgivye us our dets as we forgivye our dettes [7 dettoris], and lede us not into temptacion, but deluyer [us] from evil. Amen'. See H. Thurston, \textit{Familiar prayers: their origin and history} (London 1903) 25.
Works such as John Gau’s The richt way to the kingdom of Heuine (1533) and John Hamilton’s Catechism (1552) attest to the existence of a specifically Scottish version of the Pater in English, both in the reformist and in the Catholic tradition. Gau’s version is as follows:

1. Our fader thow gathilk is in ye heuine / thy nayme mot be hallowit / thy kingdome mot cum (to vsz)
2. thy wil mot be dwne in ye zeird as it is in the heuine
3. gift wsz this day our dailie breid /
4. and forgiff wsz our dettis as we forgiff our dettours /
5. and leid vsz noth t in temptatioun /
6. bot deliuer usz fra ewil
7. Amen.

The use of mot in the first three petitions is an example of what is the most frequently recorded use of this verb in Scottish English, namely, in principal clauses ‘in expression of a wish, supplication, request, proposal or suggestion’. The inversion of word-order in such asseverative phrases as these petitions is normal. The employment of this auxiliary serves to form a clearly optative subjunctive in contradistinction

---

20 T. G. Law (ed.), The catechism of John Hamilton (Oxford 1884). Hamilton, who was Archbishop of St Andrews, Primate of Scotland and Legatus Natus of the Holy See, was a prime figure in the effort to sustain the Catholic system up to the establishment of Protestantism in Scotland in 1560.

21 Their choice of this version seems to have been quite deliberate: as his commentaries on the Pater (Law, The catechism of John Hamilton, 248–9, 249–70) show, Hamilton at least was conversant with other standard versions. Following the Catholic practice Hamilton gives the Latin text of the Pater both before the prayer itself in English and also phrase by phrase in both of his commentaries.

22 Mitchell, The richt way to the kingdom of Heuine, 82. The text is repeated on pp. 85–96 with the single change [apart from slight orthographical variations] that fulfillit replaces dwne in the third petition. Though Hamilton’s Catechism was much nearer in time to Carsuel than Gau’s work, I have thought it preferable to give Gau’s version of the Pater in the text of this essay since Gau was a forerunner of Carsuel in the reformed tradition and therefore much more likely than Hamilton to have provided Carsuel with a model. But Hamilton’s version is identical in all relevant points with Gau’s and reads: ‘O our Father gathilk is in Hevinnis. Thy name mot be hallowit. Thy kingdome mot cum. Thy will mot be done in erd, as it is in hevin. Give us this day, our dailie breid. And forgiff us our dettis as we forgiff our dettours. And lede us nocht in temptatioun. Bot deliuer us fra ewil. Sa be it’ (Law, The catechism of John Hamilton, 249).

23 Among the examples of this quoted ibid., 2b [8], are ‘Thy nayme mot be hallowit’, referring to Gau and Hamilton; and ‘In hell condemnpyt mot he be!’, referring to Barbours, 1378).
to what, in a recent grammar of English, has been called the formulaic subjunctive, which occurs in the standard English form of these first three petitions, sanctified or hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done. Since, like the imperative, these formulaic subjunctives are realised by the base form of the verb, they may quite easily be felt and understood to be imperatives, with which the Irish imperatives of the first three petitions of the LB-EG and Liber Flavus versions could be seen to correspond. On the other hand the optative subjunctive of Carsuel’s first three petitions, and in particular the periphrastic go ma beannasighthe and go ma dênta of the first and third, would seem to be an attempt to translate as closely as possible the optatives of the Scottish English version represented by Gau and Hamilton.

As to the remainder of Carsuel’s Pater, there is nothing to choose between the BCO version and that of Gau and Hamilton, which might have influenced his translation one way or another, apart from the fact that BCO has the final doxology, Carsuel’s version of which may be the first in Irish and certainly is the oldest surviving published version in Irish.

At a number of points this first printed Irish translation of the Pater agrees well with the two older ones. Thus Carsuel’s Ar n-Althaín-ne aíd ar meamh reflects the form of this phrase in Liber Flavus, and there is virtual identity between the two versions of the fifth petition, Carsuel, however, having amhail as in LB-EG rather than mar of Liber Flavus. Again his fourth and seventh petitions are clearly modern forms of those in LB-EG, while his ná lêig . . . sind of the sixth petition is a reflex of the earlier *niroléice of LB-EG. In view of what has been said above about Carsuel’s apparent attempt to reflect an English version of the first three petitions, his retention of the lêig-form to translate English lead bears strong witness to the tenacity of this particular usage in the Irish version of the sixth petition.

Carsuel’s version of the Pater contains two further innovations: the use of laithemail in the fourth petition and of buaidhreach in the sixth. The examples of laithemail quoted in Dictionary of the Irish language [DIL] are all from the seventeenth century, but its use in the sixteenth century is attested to in three translations of the Pater, those of Flaitri
THE Pater noster in Irish

Ó Maolchonaire (1593) and Seán Ó Cearnaigh (1571) and that of Carsuel, which is the earliest. Like the older laithide, laithemail (in its various spellings) seems to belong in the main to the translation literature; and just as cceálaithe (LB-EG) and gach n-aon-lá (Liber Flavus) reflect Latin quotidiumum, so too the use of laithemail in the Pater could be taken to be due to an attempt to translate English daily. I regard it as most unlikely, however, that Carsuel was the originator of the use of this form in the Pater, for it is found, not only in Ó Maolchonaire and Ó Cearnaigh, but in all subsequent Irish versions of the Pater, and since there is little reason to suppose that Carsuel’s version influenced later Catholic translators, it is to be presumed that he and they in this matter simply accepted an already established usage. Ó Maolchonaire is particularly unlikely to have had a copy of Carsuel with him in Spain where he translated the catechism in which his versions of the Pater occur, and the same is no doubt true of Bonabentura Ó hEodhasa, who composed his Teagag Criostaidhe in Louvain in the early seventeenth century.

The use of buaidhreadh to translate temptation in the sixth petition shows a development of meaning from molestation, tribulation, which parallels that which was involved in the use in this sense of ammus (LB-EG) ‘attempt, effort, attack’, and aimsiughadh (Liber Flavus) ‘aiming at, striking at, attacking’, and which would obviously be facilitated by the understanding that here the underlying Greek word πειρασμός means ‘trial, proof, test’. In this case too I would argue that, though Carsuel provides the first record of the use of this word in the Pater, he did not himself introduce it. First, since I have suggested that Carsuel was aware of versions of the Pater similar to those of LB-EG and Liber Flavus, and given that he was a skilled translator, I believe that it is unlikely that he would have replaced an existing word by a new one in a prayer, the clear understanding of which by the people he would have regarded as essential, if that new word were not already well sanctioned by use. Second, Ó Maolchonaire has buaidhreadh, though not in the text of the Pater itself but when repeating the petition in the question and answer

29 In his translation of de Ripalda’s Exposicion breve de la doctrina christiana (1591), ed. B. Ó Cuív, ‘Flaithni Eogain’s catechism of Christian doctrine’, Celta 1/2 (1950) 161-206. On the identification of de Ripalda’s work as the original translated by Ó Maolchonaire, see Ó Cuív, Studia Celtica 14-15 (1979-80) 212 n. 7. I am grateful to Brian Ó Cuív for letting me have a partial copy of the modern (1949) edition of de Ripalda to which he refers there. I have also used an older edition in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, namely, Edward Spencer Dodgson’s 1853 edition of a Basque translation made in 1556 in which the original Spanish text is also given.

30 On his Caitiosisma, see further below.

31 Carsuel generally uses buaidhreadh in the sense of ‘disturbance, tumult’, but there is at least one other instance, apart from the Pater, in which he uses it to translate temptation, viz. ‘seasamh . . . a n-adhaidh gach uile buaidheoir’ (lines 1389-90) translating ‘to withstand all temptations’ (see McLauchlan, 86). DIL (s.v. bheidh) gives no instance of this use of the word.
discussion of the prayer, and in a formula which differs from Carsuel’s; and since I have already suggested that Ó Maolchonaire is likely to have been independent of Carsuel, in this case too this can only mean that both were drawing on established usage.

Apart from Ó Maolchonaire’s, no Catholic version of the Pater has buaidhreachd; while on the other hand, unlike Ó Cearnaigh, the Protestant works of the first half of the seventeenth century all have buaidhreachd, though again in a formula different from Carsuel’s in most cases, only the translation of the Gospel of St Luke 11:4 having the full petition in the form used by Carsuel. The word buaidhreachd was subsequently eschewed in all Irish versions of the Pater, both Catholic and Protestant.

In Scotland, Carsuel’s version of the Pater was repeated with a few changes in the Gaelic version (c.1630) of John Calvin’s Catechismus Ecclesiae Genevensis (CC) and in Foirc aodhaghearr (FA), the translation made of the Shorter catechism in 1653. Unlike Carsuel, who to a very large extent followed the literary language common to the learned men of Ireland and Scotland, the later translators tended to accommodate themselves more to the usage of contemporary Scottish Gaelic, so that their books are unlikely to have been used in Ireland. It is certain that what small changes they made in his version of the Pater had no impact here.

25Ó Cuív, Celtica 1/2 (1930) 172 line 348: ‘M. Créid iarús tú ag rásadh duibh “ná tréorraigh sinn a m’buaidhreachd”? Apart from this instance, Ó Maolchonaire does not use buaidhreachd in this sense, preferring cathuighadh in the text of the sixth petition of the Pater (line 286), in the answer to the question on it (line 350) and at lines 908 and 909, where it translates tentaciones. Buaidhirt (line 933) translates turbaciones, not tentaciones (pace Ó Cuív, 204 n.). In Desiderius (1616) Ó Maolchonaire often uses cathuighadh in both singular and plural to translate tentation (for references, see T. F. O’Rahilly (ed.), Desiderius (Dublin 1941) 288 n. catcoholic).

27Ibid., appendix II. No copy of the first edition being known to have survived, Thomson prints the second edition of 1639.

28Thomson, ibid., xvii, rejecting the claim that Carsuel was the translator of CC, seems to suggest that, though the version of the Pater in FA is similar to Carsuel’s, that in the translation of CC is different from both and ‘derives from Calvin’s Latin’. In his edition of FU (p. 138), however, he describes this latter as ‘a very similar rendering’ to Carsuel’s. It is in fact so, and differs from his only in an increased use of emphatic suffixes (hainmsa, righese, thoilse, dhúinne (x 2)); pl. neamhdaith for sing. neamh and naomhtha for neart in the first petition; ciulain (i.e. giulain ‘bear, carry; permit’) for ríg in the sixth; ó nolc for ó nolc in the seventh; and ríocht for ríocht and gus na saoghaltaith for tré bhiath stóir in the doxology. The version in FA differs from Carsuel’s in the following details: three extra emphatic suffixes (hainmsa, ríochtadh, thóilile); ríochtadh for ríocht in the second petition and in the doxology; dénar for go na dénna and air dalmhainn for a dalmhainn in the third petition; and cumhachd for hearth, gu stórmeadh for tré bhiath stóir and Amen for Biodh amhlaith in the doxology.
3. Ó CEARNAIGH'S AIBIDIL GAOIDHELGE AGUS CAITICIOSMA

Sean Ó Cearnaigh published his Aibidil Gaoidheilge agus caiticiosma in 1571 in Dublin, where he was treasurer of St Patrick's Cathedral. After the title-page, epistle to the reader and some notes on the Irish alphabet come two of the most substantial sections of the book, namely, the Caiticiosma itself (11–21), which consists of a translation of the catechism in the Book of Common Prayer (BCP) of 1559, and Forim Urrnaighthe (21–40), which, among some other prayers, including a prayer for the Church militant from the Communion Service of BCP, contains morning and evening prayers and grace before and after meals taken, as Tomás de Bhaldraithe has shown, from Carsuel's FU.

Ó Cearnaigh's version of the Pater occurs in the Caiticiosma section at pages 19–20 and is as follows:

1 A athair atá annsna neamhath naomh thar hainm.
2 Tiegadh do fhlaitheamhna.
3 Bhioth do thoil mar atá ar neamh agus ar talamh.
4 Tabhair dhúinn anuí ar n-anrán laethemhail féin,
5 agus maith dhúinn ar bhiacha amhail agus maithmidne dár bhiachaighthoiribh féin,
6 agus ná troérai实现 thachughadh sind,
7 achr saor sind on clc.

Oir is leat féin in rioghadh an cumbhacht agus an glóir tré bhíthibh síor. Amen.

It is clear that, though Ó Cearnaigh used other prayers from Carsuel's FU, his version of the Pater is, as de Bhaldraithe pointed out, quite different from Carsuel's. A possible explanation for this is that Ó Cearnaigh may have produced his translation of the Pater before Carsuel's book came to hand, indeed before it was even published. In his letter to the reader, Ó Cearnaigh refers to a previous version of his Catechism which he had published in 1563. This cannot have contained 36 For an account of Ó Cearnaigh and his work see Williams, I bprionta i leabhar, 21–6. I have used a photostat copy of Aibidil Gaoidheilge agus caiticiosma which is in the Royal Irish Academy.

38 This edited version is from de Bhaldraithe, 63–4. The original (with abbreviations italicised and the punctum deleted represented by italic h) is as follows: ‘A athair atá annsna neamhath naomh thar hainm. Tiegadh do fhlaitheamhna. Bhioth do thoil mar atá ar neamh agus ar talamh. Tabhair dhúinn anuí ar n-anrán laethemhail féin, agus maith dhúinn ar bhiacha amhail agus maithmidne dár bhiachaighthoiribh, féin. Agus ná troérai实现 thachughadh sind, achr saor [sic] sind on clc. Oir is leat féin in rioghadh an cumbhacht agus an glóir tré bhíthibh síor. Amen.’
39 Ibid., 63.
40 Agus ní h'éamháin atá aga iarraidh ort an ceartaghad a ceannas ceartamach sín do tábharlaí an aghéithe. Acht cheanna, ar in dhrasalás naí ar in arrthughadh do réimeas na in gcaiticiosma so, do chuirteadh amach roimhe ar maór an chualadh lenn 1563 d'áois an Tighearnai (p. 8). Both de Bhaldraithe (p. 65) and Williams (I bprionta i leabhar, 141, and see 28) read ar maór an chualadh an ar maór an chualadh.
Carsuel's prayers, since his book did not appear until 1567, but presumably it did contain the translation of the Catechism of BCP, including the Pater. Having already provided a translation of the Pater in 1563, he must have decided to retain it in 1571, and not to reject it in favour of Carsuel's.

Since Ó Cearnaigh's original of the text in which the Pater occurs, viz. the Catechism of BCP, was in English, one would perhaps assume that the English version of the Pater would have formed the basis for the Irish. There is no evidence that this was so; rather it would seem that this Irish version owes much to earlier Irish versions and also shows signs of the influence of a Latin (or Greek) original.

The official text of the Pater in English which was imposed by Henry VIII in 1541 had 'And lette us not be ledde into temptation' in the sixth petition, though the earlier quasi-official version of The institution of a Christian man (1537) had had 'And lede us not into temptation'. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI of 1549 the earlier formula was restored, and thus was produced the text of the Pater in English which became standard in BCP:

1 Oure father whiche arte in heauen, hallowed be thy name.
2 Thy kyngdom come.
3 Thy wyll be done in earth as it is in heauen.
4 Geue vs this da yly bread.
5 And forgeue vs oure trespasses, as we forgeue them that trespass agaynst vs.
6 And leade vs not into temptacion.
7 But deliuer vs from euell. Amen.

The phrase most suggestive of a connection between the English and Irish versions is that of the sixth petition, where ná treorraigh appears for the first time. The formula ná treorraigh . . . sind could be taken to be a literal translation of the English leade vs not. However, it is also true that it 'would seem to provide a reasonable equivalent of ne nos [i.e. in several gars], but while de Bhaldraithe suggests that this may mean that he published it in various print styles, Williams (24) offers the view that do chuir e adh amach . . . linn does not necessarily mean that he published the book, but that he issued it in several manuscript copies.

41 This argument can also be used to explain the great differences between Ó Cearnaigh's and Carsuel's version of the Creed and the Ten Commandments noticed by de Bhaldraithe (Eigse 9 (1958) 64), since they also occur in the Caiticiosma section of Ó Cearnaigh's book.

42 From V. Staley (ed.), The first prayer book of King Edward VI (Library of Liturgiology and Ecclesiology for English Readers 33, London 1903) [21]. A photograph of this page of the original (1549) will be found in E. C. Rashdill (ed.), The Book of Common Prayer: its making and revisions 1549-1661 (London 1949) pl. 22. For the text of the Pater in the 1559 BCP, which is the same as that produced here, see The prayer-book of Queen Elizabeth (The Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature, London 1826) 43 (Morning prayer), 119 (Catechism).
inducas of the Latin Vulgate and μὴ τίσιν ἅγις ἃς of the Greek', and since other aspects of Ó Ceannaigh's version seem to reflect a Latin or Greek, rather than an English, original, on balance I prefer to take it that the same is true of this form of the sixth petition also. As we shall see, there is clear evidence that Ó Ceannaigh's version of the Pater is not an original translation but owes much to earlier Irish versions, in particular to the LB–EG tradition. It would seem that he was not the first to use the verb treoraigh in this formula either, for it also occurs in Ó Maolchóir's discussion of the Pater, and, since I believe that it is unlikely that Ó Maolchóir was influenced by Ó Ceannaigh any more than by Cursel, I regard it as most probable that both adopted an existing translation. It is, of course, also possible, that both chanced on the same verb independently of each other; but, given that the range of options is not unduly limited, the likelihood of this having happened can be discounted.

Ó Ceannaigh's version of the third petition is meaningless, the word-order of the second part of the formula, mar air neamh agus ar talamh, being clearly due to a slavish attempt to provide a word for word rendering of the Latin sicul in caelo et in terra or of the Greek ὁς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, and owing nothing to English in earth as it is in heaven. So too in the first petition neamhaidh reflects the plural of Latin caelis and Greek τοῖς οὐρανοῖς rather than the English singular heaven; and facha and fachaidhthoiribh of the fifth petition translate Latin debita and debitoriibus, Greek ὀφίληματα and ὀφίληταις, rather than trespasses and them that trespass against us of BCP. In these latter instances, however, it must be admitted that there is every reason to believe that these forms are derived from earlier Irish versions of the Pater, for plural nimib is well represented in the LB–EG texts, and facha, fecheimnib etc. are found in the three earlier versions to the exclusion of anything else. Indeed Ó Ceannaigh's version is remarkably faithful to the oldest Irish version of LB–EG. His first two petitions, as 44 Ó Cuív, Celtica 1/2 (1980) 172 line 348. The original Spanish has nothing to suggest the use of treoraigh.

45 Many earlier English versions of the Pater, including that of the Scottish BCO as we have seen, had debts and debtors here (e.g. The kalender of shepheardes, London 1605). This continued to be true of translations of the Biblical text (e.g. Wiclif (1380), Cranmer (1539), Geneva (1582), Authorised (1611); see Samuel Bagster (publ.), The English heesapl (London n.d.), at Matthew 6:12; and, with the change of trespassers and trespasses found in some versions of the prayer printed early in the sixteenth century (e.g. Mirror of Our Lady (1530); Tyndale's translation (1534) of Matthew 6:12; see Bagster, The English heesapl) and, with the change of trespassers to them that trespass against us, constitute the formula which was adopted in the version of the Pater which appears in the quasi-official The institution of a Christian man (1537), in the official Henrician version (1541) and in the BCP from 1549 on. Both debt and trespass (in the broader sense of transgression, offence, sin) are valid translations of the underlying Aramaic word, which covered the full semantic range involved in the two words in English (see A. Durand, J. Huby, J. J. Heenan, The word of salvation I (Milwaukee 1957) 108). well as the first part of the third and fourth, and also the fifth and seventh petitions are simply modern versions of the earlier formulae, with fláithseamhadh replacing the related fláiththiu, maith-, as in the Liber Flavus version) replacing log-, fláitghóiridh replacing the related fícheannadh, and ón ole replacing ó cechoi ule. The retention of A athaír and ínse nimib (LB-1B, EG-1B; hi nimib LB-1A) in the first petition is striking, since these had been replaced by Ar nAthairne and ar nimh (neamh) in Liber Flavus and Carsuel. But the retention of Bíd do thol in the third petition is of particular significance, for though on the one hand Bíd had been replaced by Déantair in Liber Flavus and by go ma dénta in Carsuel, on the other hand it is found in Ó Maolchonaire, which, for the same reason as in the case of *treoir*igh, I would argue is due to both Ó Cearnaigh and Ó Maolchonaire adopting independently an existing formula, in this instance that of the LB-EG tradition.

Ó Cearnaigh’s translation of tentatio in the sixth petition is catfhughadh, which is not found in any earlier version of the Pater. However, the extension of meaning from ‘fighting, battling’ to ‘t e m p *a tion’ had taken place at least as early as the fifteenth century, and the word was certainly firmly established as bearing this sense by the early seventeenth century. It is unlikely that Ó Cearnaigh was the first to use it in the Pater, for Ó Maolchonaire has it, not only in the main text of the prayer, but also in the answer to the question on the sixth petition, even though the word does not occur in the question, in which, quite confusingly, a version of the petition is quoted which is very different from that of the text of the prayer. Once again I would argue that both Ó Cearnaigh and Ó Maolchonaire took this word from an existing translation.

The predominant feature of Ó Cearnaigh’s version then is the number of its formulae which appear to derive ultimately from the LB-EG tradition: indeed its principal importance lies in the evidence it provides

---

46. Ón ole: not only is this stylistically valid, it is also supported by the Greek καθ’ and καθ’ έρημος and by modern scholarship, e.g. The Jerusalem Bible (1966), which gives from the evil one as its primary reading.

47. Ó Cuív, Celtica 1/2 (1950) 171 line 283, and see 172 line 329. The Spanish has hagase (hacer, to do).

48. See C. Ó Maonaigh (ed.), Smaointe Beatha Chriost (Baile Átha Cliath 1944) lines 1308-1310: ‘... et temptationibus Domini... treigenus in Tiglerna, osus in catughadh do cuiradh air’. The first example quoted in DIL s.v. catughadh (c) is not relevant, for cathaga[n*]a* cella there translates beidh caruis; and the dating of the second example, that from Diogleim dána, 53.10, cannot be established since the attribution of the poem in question to Domnchadh Mór Ó Dálaigh is in doubt: see L. Mac Cionnaith, Diogleim dána (Baile Átha Cliath 1938) 624. The instances from Smaointe Beatha Chriost (1430 x 1461) and Ó Cearnaigh are not given in DIL.

49. For Ó Maolchonaire’s use of it in his Catechism (1593) and in Desiderius (1616), see note 32 above. For Bonabhertna Ó hEodhassa (1611), see F. Mac Raghnaill (ed.), An tréasach Griosdaithí (Baile Átha Cliath 1976) 108 s.v. catughadh.

51. ibid., 172 lines 347-50.
for the strong survival of that version well into the second half of the sixteenth century. Other details, including the use of laethamhail,52 tnoaigh and catthughadh, seem to represent borrowings from a more recent version or versions, while the infelicity of mar atá ar neamh agus ar talamh is simply due to imitation of the word-order of the Latin or Greek original. I have not been able to ascertain whether Ó Cearnaigh himself was responsible for modernising the LB/EG version and for adopting those other alterations, or whether he simply used a version in which those changes had been made.

It is strange that Ó Cearnaigh should have added the final doxology to the Pater, since it does not occur in the BCP of 1559, nor in any other edition of it before the seventeenth century.53 The doxology was used in the liturgy of the early Christian Church, whence it was imported into manuscript copies of St Matthew's Gospel to be subsequently retained in some printed Greek, Latin and vernacular editions of the New Testament. It is possible that Ó Cearnaigh, on the basis of the Scriptural evidence available to him and of common practice, believed that the doxology was an integral part of the Pater, and so added it to his translation, even though it did not appear in BCP. If he did so in 1571, he may have been influenced by BCO mediated by Carsuel, though his translation of the doxology is clearly different from Carsuel's. On the other hand if he did so in 1563, then his is the first version of the doxology in Irish for which evidence exists.54

52See my earlier comments.
53As we have seen (above) it was used in BCO from the beginning; it was introduced into the Scottish BCP in 1637 and became general from the 1662 revision of BCP on; see P. C. Cross (ed.), The Oxford dictionary of the Christian Church 2nd ed. revised (Oxford 1983) 836.
54(a) It is noteworthy that whereas in the second petition regnum (Baile, reghum) is translated by faihithe amhnas, in the doxology it is translated by riogacht.
(b) The use of the dat. pl. of bhith both here and at p. 40 in the phrase tré bhiththi sior (for ever) is interesting, for though the preposition tré may be followed by the dative, use of the accusative is general, particularly in this phrase tré bhith sior [see DIL s.v. sior, and O'Rahilly, Desiderius, 284-5 s.v. biot]. Though the plural is later frequently replaced by the singular tré bhith sior, tré bhioth a(ch)thor, and though Irish grammatical tracts II (ed. O. Bergin, supplement to Érainn 8-10 (1916-1917)) § 71 states that bhith has no plural ('bhith acht gan illradh aige'), the plural tré bhiothas sior survived strongly into the modern period (see DIL s.v. sior; O'Rahilly, Desiderius, 285 s.v. biot; see further Mac Raghnaill, An teagasg Criostaidhe, line 1617), and some instances in seventeenth-century texts of northern provenance show palatal -th (see P. Ó Stiúilbhéidh (ed.), Beatha San Fionnas (Baile Átha Cliath 1987) line 3113 tré bhioth sior; A. Ó Fatha (ed.), Parídas an sarna (Baile Átha Cliath 1980) line 8961 tré bhídhe, as well as line 6157 tré bhioth sior).
The Gospels contain two accounts of Christ's teaching his disciples to pray the Pater, namely, Matthew 6:9-13 and Luke 11:2-4. The text of the prayer given in Matthew is the one which has traditionally been used in recitation of the prayer, while in critical editions of the Gospels Luke's version differs from it in the wording of the fourth and fifth petitions and in the omission of part of the first petition and all of the third and seventh. 55 In many manuscript copies of the Gospels, however, the 'deficiencies' in Luke are made good in wording which follows that of Matthew, with the result that the two versions differ from one another only in the wording of the fourth and fifth petitions (and in the fact that the doxology does not occur in Luke). It is this 'restored' version of the Pater which is found in Luke in the Textus receptus of the Greek New Testament, and which is translated in Uílliam Ó Domhnaill's Tiomna Nuadh. There are thus two versions of the Pater in the Tiomna Nuadh, both of which merit consideration.

It seems that the project to have the New Testament translated into Irish was initiated early in the reign of Elizabeth I. At all events by December 1567 the Government was expressing disappointment that no progress had been made and was threatening to reclaim the money provided to have a font of type made for that purpose. 56 Twenty years later in 1587 the English Privy Council were reported to believe that the New Testament had been translated and that the manuscript was in the hands of the printer; 57 but it would appear that that belief was not well founded, for, in the preface Do chuma an Béaghthóin which Uílliam Ó Domhnail prefixed to his Tiomna Nuadh in 1602, he states that five years previously, in 1597, only the four Gospels had been translated, and only the Gospels of Matthew and Mark and the first five chapters of Luke had been printed.

Those initially engaged in the enterprise were Seán Ó Cearnaigh (author of Aibidil Gaoidheilge agus caidicioma, who died in 1587), Nicolás Bhailís (bishop of Ossory, 1577-85) and Feargaímann Ó Domhnalllín (archbishop of Tuam, 1595-1609). Apparently after the deaths of Bhailís and Ó Cearnaigh, Úilliam Ó Domhnaill became involved in it, together with Maolín Óg Mac Bruideadha, and then after 1597 it fell to Ó Domhnaill, assisted by Domhnaill Óg Ó hUiginn, to complete the work of translating and printing the Tiomna Nuadh. Ó Domhnaill's brief report in his Epistle dedicatio is complemented by the account which he gives of the work in the preface:

55 The Jerusalem Bible (1966) translates Luke 11:2-4 as follows: Father, may your name be held holy, your kingdom come; give us each day our daily bread, and forgive us our sins, for we ourselves forgive each one who is in debt to us. And do not put us to the test.
56 See Williams, Isprionta i leabhar , 21-2.
57 ibid., 22-30.
Yet blessed be the memorie of such as haue given the first attempt to enterprise this worke, namely Maister Nicholas Walsh that famous Bishopppe and Martyr, Maister John Kearny, and Nehemias Donellan now Archbishop of Tuame: whose godly indeuours were notwithstanding vntimely cut off in Gods secret judgement, and the weight of the burden cast vpon my weake shoulders. . . .

Biodh gu bhafuadar dacine diagha, foirfe, foghomtha lor saothair dha taobh roimhe so: mar atá Seán Ó Cearnúidh . . . agus Nicolas Bhailis . . . maille ré Fergusainin Ó Domhannallín . . . noch dho ghabh saothar mór air féin maille riomsa agus ré Maculín Og Macc Bhruaideadha, duine úilmar sa teanguidh Ghaoidheilge, sa gColáiste nuadh líamh ré Baile Átha Cliatá, ait 'nar cáróchnuighemair maille re na chur a gcló Ghaoidheilge . . . gus an seisíadh caibidil do thsaistéil Lúchas, agus an chuid eile dho boisgul sin, agus soisgul Éoin, sgríobhadh ré láimh gan chur a gcló an tan sin, ná fós gu ceann cuig mblíadhán 'na dhaoinigh, nó gu dtáinic dáíomsa tré thol Dé, maille ré cungnamh Domhannull Óg Í Uigín, (air ar chuir mé ualach na coda eile dho sgríobhadh do réir óghum agus chirt na G(h)aoideilge,) crioch dho chur uírthi. . . .

It is not surprising, given that the work extended over so many years and that so many people had a hand in it, that the translation is far from being all of a piece. Ó Domhnaill insisted in his Epistle de dicatorie that his source language was 'the original Greek e/, vnto which I tyed myselfe, as of dutie I ought'. There is no reason to doubt the truth of this statement, for he himself and Ó Cearnaigh, Bhailis and Ó Domhannallín had received a university education and would have been competent in Greek. Nevertheless Nicholas Williams has shown that the translation was at times influenced by the Latin of the Vulgate and the English of the Geneva Bible also, and the translation of the two versions of the Pater was influenced by still other factors.

The version of the Pater in the Gospel of St Matthew is as follows:

1 Ar n-athairne atá ar neamh, naomháthar hainm.
2 Tigeadá do rioghaichd.
3 Déuntar do thoil ar an Ítalámá mar atá ar neamh.
4 Tabháir dathún a níu ar n-anán léithamáil.

58 Tiomna Nuadh ar dTigherna agus ar Stúnghthora Iosa Orfoad, 1 verso; from the copy in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, shelfmark A.F.2.
59bid., Do chum an Ísighthór. Here and elsewhere, apart from normalising the use of length accents, of punctuation and of capitals, I have not otherwise edited Ó Domhnaill's text, except as indicated by the use of brackets, of italics to represent the few contradictions and of italicised á to represent the punctum delens.
60bid., 1 verso. See also Do chum an Ísighthóir: [An] Tiomna Nuadh, . . . ar na tarruing gu diogmhailta, . . . a nGaoideilge, as an teanguidh fhéirfe Ghrúgise in ar sgríobhaidh le tar tús. . . .; see further title-page.
61I hprionta i leabhair, 33-4
This is sufficiently similar to the version in Seán Ó Cearnaigh's _Adidil Gaoideilge asus caiteiceassma_ to suggest that Ó Cearnaigh may have been the translator, but there are obvious important differences between the two also: _Ar n-alaírime_ for _A alhaw_, _ar neamh_ for _annsma neamhaíth_ (first petition), _róghachd_ for _faithamháin_ (second petition), _Déunlar_ for _Biodh_ (third petition), _fítheamháinbhe_ for _faithghóithir_ (fifth petition), _do chum buaidheartha_ for _don chathughadh_ (sixth petition), _gu siorruighde_ for _tré bhithidh sior_ (doxology). It is not possible to establish whether Ó Cearnaigh himself or some other collaborator was responsible for these revisions, but the first five of them reflect a move in the direction of the tradition represented by the _Liber Flavus_ text, while the use of _buaidhreadh_ in the sixth petition shows awareness of a usage already seen in Carsuel and Ó Máolchonaire. Two of these changes (_Ar n-alaírime_ and _Déunlar_) might be seen as achieving a closer approximation to the original Greek, while one (_ar neamh_) is a move in the opposite direction. That the revision was not always skilfully done is shown by the asyntactic use of _mar atá_ to refer to _Déunlar_ in the second petition. This may have been due to replacing _Biodh_ by _Déunlar_ and failing to notice the syntactical consequences later in the sentence, but it is also possible that it may be the result of an attempt to translate English 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven'.

Since the first, second, third, sixth and seventh petitions of the _Pater_ as it occurs in Luke in the _Textus receptus_ are identical with those in

---

62 The Greek of the _Textus receptus_ reads as follows:

63 The ultimate model would be LB-EG, 'Bid do thoil i talmain amal atá i mim'; but Ó Cearnaigh's 'Biodh do thoil mar atá ar neamh agus ar talamh', if it was the immediate model, required further correction because of its own awkwardness. Carsuel's 'go madffra do thoil a dhalmuin mar atá ar neamh' may not be irrelevant.

64 The Geneva Bible (1557) has 'Thy will be done even in earth, as it is in heaven'; see Bagster, _The English hexapla_.

Matthew, one might expect that the Irish translation of them would be the same in both instances also. This is far from being the case; indeed the two versions of the first three petitions and of the sixth show striking discrepancies. The Pater in Luke reads as follows:

1. Ó ar n-atáirne atá ar neamh, gu naomhthar hainn.
2. Gu dtí do rioghachd.
3. Gu ndéntar do thoil ar an talamh mar atá ar neamh.
4. Tabhair dhuinn ar n-aran laothamh uil gach laoi.
5. Agus maith dún a bheacaigh, òir maithmidni dá gach aon ar a bhféil fiacha aguinn.
6. Agus ná léig a mbuidhreachd sinn.
7. achd saor sinn ón ocl.

That this version was not produced totally independently of that in Matthew is shown by the presence of the faulty mar atá in the third petition and also perhaps of ón ocl in the seventh petition. On the other hand the imperatives naomhthar, Tiogadh and Déntar of the first three petitions in Matthew are here replaced by the optative subjunctive forms gu naomhthar, Gu dtí and Gu ndéntar, while tromgh do chum of the sixth petition is replaced by léig a. A likely model for both of these important changes is Carsuel. The version of the sixth petition here is identical with his in all details including word-order, while that of the second petition agrees with his except only for the replacement of righ by rioghachd. The change from go ma dénia to go ndéntar would provide an excellent explanation for the use of asyntactic mar atá, or for its retention if it was taken over from Matthew. Of course, the replacement of the periphrastic formulae by the more direct ones, and especially of go ma beandaighthe by gu naomhthar, might be considered to present a difficulty. But what is at issue is the use of the optative subjunctive rather than the imperative, not the precise realisation of the optative; and in any case it is not necessary to postulate direct influence of the text of Carsuel’s Pater on the version in Ó Domhnall’s Gospel of St Luke, which cannot indeed be proven, but rather to envisage that influence being mediated through awareness of the tradition represented by Carsuel’s text.\footnote{The fluidity of that tradition may be illustrated by the fact that later on, in the Gaelic version of Calvin’s Catechism (c.1630), go ma beandaighthe was changed to go ma naomhthar.}

Though we know that by 1597 all four Gospels had been translated into Irish, but that only up to the end of the fifth chapter of Luke’s Gospel had been printed, it is still far from clear by what stages the remainder of that Gospel reached its printed form. Had the eleventh chapter of Luke, then, been translated before the deaths of Bhailis and Ó Cearnaigh, or was it translated subsequently when Ó Domhnall and Mac Bruaidheadha had begun to work with Ó Domhnallain on the translation? What editorial freedom had Mac Bruaidheadha and, subsequently...
Ó hUiginn, who were employed because of their expertise in the Irish language and its orthography? It may be that what remained in manuscript after 1597 was revised before being printed in 1602, and that, when he came to the Pater, the reviser was influenced by a version with which he was familiar which had the optative subjunctive forms rather than the imperative in the first three petitions and leig rather than teamaigh in the sixth. If so, Domhnall Óg Ó hUiginn is more likely than Uilliam Ó Domhnaill himself to have been responsible for these changes, for when Ó Domhnaill came to translate the BCP he retained the imperatives and teamaigh.

Though the version of the Pater in the Gospel of St Luke is not directly relevant to the tradition of the Pater as public and private prayer, this translation in Ó Domhnaill's Tiomna Nuadh is important in that it indicates that a version having the optative subjunctive forms was known, and perhaps was in frequent use at least by some people, in Ireland before 1602. When a new edition of An Tiomna Nuadh was published in 1681, however, the optative forms were replaced by the imperative in the translation of Luke 11:2. On the other hand the version of St Matthew's Gospel was repeated, though in somewhat revised form, in the three other Reformation texts of the first half of the seventeenth century.

5. OTHER TEXTS, 1608–1652

Leabhar na nUarnaightheadh gComhchoidchiond (LUC), Uilliam Ó Domhnaill's translation of the BCP of 1604, was printed in 1608 and published in 1609. 67 H. R. McAdoo, who considered it to be 'one of the monuments of Irish translation', noted that Ó Domhnaill showed 'that intuition for the mot juste which is the inevitable component of the first-class translator'. 68 It is not surprising then that in retaining, as he does, the Tiomna Nuadh version of the Pater in St Matthew's Gospel, he found it necessary to emend the translation of the third petition, replacing aith with do mithear, thus returning to the formula found in the Liber Flavus. 69 He also introduced some minor alterations: thainmsi for hainm (first petition); ar thairibhain for ar an thalamh (third petition); and the deletion of a gas mar after amhuil (fifth petition) and of do before chum (sixth petition). The final doxology is, of course, omitted since it did not appear in the BCP of 1604.

In 1631 William Bedell, provost of Trinity College, Dublin (1627–9), and bishop of Kilmore (1629–42), published a thirteen-page, carelessly edited and printed, bilingual work, Afhúr i. theaguisg chenuíosugheadh...

67 See Williams, I sprions i leabhar, 37, 35.
69 The Pater occurs on page A3 (Tadhg) of LUC and again, with some orthographical changes, on page MMm reici (An catechismo). I have used the copy in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, shelfmark A.6.26.
THE PATER NOSTER IN IRISH

Among other items this small work contains a copy of the Pater (pp. 2-4), which, misprints and other mistakes and some orthographical changes aside, is the same as the version in Matthew’s Gospel, including the final doxology, with the exceptions that hainm replaces haim (first petition), and that agus mar after amhail (fifth petition) is deleted, as is also do before chum (sixth petition). These minor changes would seem to indicate that Bedell also had LUC to hand, since the same changes appear in it. Nevertheless he opted to retain the faulty translation of the second petition in the version in Matthew’s Gospel rather than adopt the superior revised translation of LUC.

Finally in 1652 Gofraidh Mac Domhnaill published An te agasc Cristluidhė nó fundameint an chréidimh Cristluidhē, which consists of a translation of William Perkins’s The Christian doctrine or the foundation of Christ’s religion. Apart from the translation, the book also contains a number of other items, including the Creed, the Pater and the Ten Commandments, all three of which were taken from Bedell’s Aibgitir. Mac Domhnaill’s version of the Pater is the same as Bedell’s, including the doxology, with the exception that he has adopted the superior LUC translation of the second petition in preference to the faulty one found in Bedell. The orthographical evidence and that of misprints and other mistakes would suggest that Mac Domhnaill was using both Bedell and LUC simultaneously, following now one and again the other.

Four Reformation texts of the first half of the seventeenth century present, then, what is basically the same version of the Pater. We have seen that this version may not be fully representative of popular practice, and, in any case, the variations, trifling though some of them are, suggest that this version did not have the status of being a sole approved formula which would have become stereotyped by constant use. Nevertheless their version is not very different from that which, as I hope to show in a further article, appeared in a sequence of Catholic published

---

70 For a description of the book and its contents see Williams, I bprionta i leabhar, 46-7. There are two photographic copies of the work in the National Library of Ireland, both of which I have consulted, namely, a photostat copy (p. 2179) and a copy on microfilm (pos. 450).

71 On the Irish and English versions of the author’s name, and for a description of the book and its contents, see N. Williams, I bprionta i leabhar, 191 n. 12, 60-61. I have consulted a copy on microfilm (pos. 450) in the National Library of Ireland.

72 Williams, 61, considers this probable. I regard it as certain: the introductory note preceding each item is the same in both, and, though Mac Domhnaill corrects some of Bedell’s misprints and mistakes he retains others: e.g. in the Pater, a full stop between buidhe artha (Mac Domhnaill, buaighe artha) and a/l (sixth petition); length mark on the second syllable of rioghdá (Mac Domhnaill, rioghdád) (in the doxology).

73 He even follows LUC in placing a comma after thoil in this petition. On the other hand he follows Bedell in having ar an tálaim instead of ar talaim of LUC.
works of the seventeenth century, and indeed it was this Catholic version which was to appear in St Matthew's Gospel in the 1681 revision of Ó Domhnaill's Tiomna Nuadh. The cumulative influence of these works, both Protestant and Catholic, through their use in catechesis, must have ensured a significant role as public and private prayer for their very similar versions of the Pater.

Cathal Ó Háinle

Trinity College, Dublin